Towards a European Strategy for Gender Equality: Protecting the Health and Well-being of Vulnerable Women

Overview

According to the World Health Organisation, health represents 'a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.' Both biological differences and gender-related socioeconomic determinants are important in health and have a different impact on women and men and on their access to health care. In Europe, discriminatory gender roles still compromise the health of women and girls and, in turn, affect families and communities. Furthermore, healthcare providers and advocates are increasingly recognising devastating physical and mental health effects of domestic violence globally. Despite the progress that the EU has made in terms of raising public awareness, there is still a need to ensure the rights and trust of victims in institutions protecting their rights.

The Council of Europe has endorsed universality, access to quality care, equity, and solidarity as common values and principles underpinning the health systems of the EU Member States. However, certain marginalised groups, such as people living with HIV, the LGBT community or sex workers are still 'hard to reach' for health services. Reducing health inequalities, among which gender and inclusion of vulnerable groups are recognised as determinants should, therefore, be one of the priorities of health systems in Europe.

Sexual and Reproductive Health and Right (SRHR) is one of the most controversial topics in our society. In 2013, the Women's Rights and Gender Equality Committee (FEMM) of the European Parliament presented the Estrela Report, totalling nearly 90 recommendations and opinions on sexual and reproductive health and rights. The report, which was later rejected by the Parliament, called for access to safe and legal abortion, non-discrimination, and the right to access health care and sexual education. There is a need to address the range of barriers women can face in accessing health services, which consequently prevents them from fully utilising their fundamental right to health.

This timely International Symposium continues the debate on how to work towards an EU-wide policy framework on gender equality and non-discriminatory access to health care. It provides a key platform for the discussion of a better European regulatory framework aimed at strengthening prevention, protection and inclusion. The Symposium will support the exchange of ideas and best practices and encourage delegates to engage in thought-provoking topical debate whilst sharing best practices and lessons learned.

“ We know that differences in social and economic conditions are major drivers of inequalities in health. This is why achieving the goals of the Europe 2020 strategy – smart, sustainable and – very importantly – inclusive growth, are essential to reduce health inequalities. We continue our efforts to push forward the health angle within the European Semester, and redouble our efforts to ensure that health is for everybody, everywhere in the EU.”

- Tonio Borg, EU Commissioner for Health, January 2014

“ Is it only policy rhetoric or are we witnessing the progress of real organisation-wide systems and resources in place, to ensure that gender is everyone's business?”

- Virginija Lagbakk, Director of the European Institute for Gender Equality, April 2013
